Dangers of buying medicines online

As more people use the internet to understand their health issues, some also go online to buy prescription medication. But many online pharmacies are unregistered, so buying from them is potentially unsafe. Medication, cholesterol-lowering medication Lipitor (Atorvastatin), is often sold cheaply online and without a GP prescription or the advice of a pharmacist. But this is risky because medication should only be taken under the supervision of a healthcare professional. Their guidance on whether a medication is suitable for you, the dosage, possible side effects, and any harmful interactions with other medications is crucial. Medication from an unregistered website could also be dangerous to your health because it might be out-of-date, diluted or fake. For prescription-only medicines, an online pharmacy must receive a legally valid prescription before dispensing the medication. This means you'll either need a paper prescription or an electronic prescription via the Electronic Prescription Service (EPS) from your GP or another healthcare professional.
